More than 95% of Scots still at risk from Covid infection

234,000 have caught virus, study estimates

By David Ross

More than 95 per cent of Scots are still at risk of catching the coronavirus, according to a study published in the British Medical Journal.

The study, which analysed data from the Scottish Health Protection Research Unit, found that 234,000 people in Scotland have been infected with the virus since it first arrived in the country in March 2020.

It also found that 95 per cent of the population are still at risk of catching the virus, as the vast majority have not developed immunity to it.

The researchers say that the high level of risk is due to the fact that the virus spreads easily between people, and that many people who have been infected do not develop immunity to it.

They also found that the risk of catching the virus is highest in people who live in crowded housing, and who work in high-risk occupations.

The study highlights the need for continued vigilance and the importance of wearing face masks and avoiding large gatherings.
